Schnell takes over as managing director of Lo Schiffbau dervedt - difficult marketing and business development at Carabao, has left his role, marking the end of his second stint at the energy drink company.

As managing director, it is my mission to make energy drinks fun again, bring back that originality and authenticity. Thirty-three is what we did with Lo, taking something that was tired and bringing it back to life.

Schell takes over the top job from Vincent Stallen, who was instrumental in the brand's UK launch more than a decade ago. He spent eight years at the company before taking a newly created role within the Coca-Cola brand part of AB InBev, where he will concentrate on accelerating the growth of the brand.

of course.

He later admits that his unexpected departure from Carabao was not so much different from that of his predecessor. I loved my time at Carabao, I loved the team, but I never thought I'd miss the process's hustle and bustle. During my second tenure at Carabao, I looked around and thought:

Do you know what? It's not the right environment for me anymore.

Carabao currently holds an eight percent market share of the UK's £756m energy drinks market, according to the latest Nielsen data. With plans to renovate its entire squad of ambassadors - including previous snooker world champion Shaun Murphy - the brand is hoping to take another sizable chunk out of market leader Red Bull's dominance.

Whether it is Schell's 'banter' - his mockney accent or his insistence on talking about Itah versus Red Bull, competitive edge. And while he thinks that his job involves competing with the market leaders, for its part, it looks like a cat drink you shouldn't try this at home.

Having tasted sweet success as marketing director for Carabao's sister brand in a trade visit, Schell knows a thing or two about spotting brands that are down on their luck.

I love brands that have the potential to be significant, but just haven't got the magic they deserve. That's Carabao. Schell's ambition is not only to ensure that the brand can legitimately lay claim to such a
